Once all the holes are drilled, plug the buffer in and turn it on. Once it is running unplug it without turning it off. I guess you could relocate the on/off switch or cut a hole where the button is, but if I'm not using it I don't need it plugged in anyway. So now that it is turned on, but unplugged, set the buffer in place. One by one stick a zip tie in the bottom hole, stick your hand down the side of the inside of the bucket and guide the tip tie through the handle then out the other hole. Only loosely fasten them do not tighten them at this time. Once all the zip ties are in place, methodically go around and slightly tighten each zip tie, While making sure the buffer stays in the center. What I did was tighten up one then spin the wheel and make sure it doesn't hit then do the next one. Once they are all tight make sure it doesn't hit when you spin it and then plug it in. If it is not hitting the walls of the bucket then move on to the next step. It does not have to be perfectly centered, it just cant hit the walls. Once you have this working properly go on to the next step. Regular readers of my App Builder posts know how much I enjoy taking a break from my day gig as an Android enterprise app developer and playing around with the multimedia capabilities of Google's operating system. I particularly enjoy Android's animation capabilities, and getting to draw directly to the canvas object. With the release of Android 4.1 (Jelly Bean), Google did a lot of work under the hood to improve the underlying framework that drives the animation, not just in terms of speed but also in the overall smoothness and consistency of visual elements. Getting the opportunity to see the updated animation engine firsthand on my Nexus S proved a perfect excuse for me to write a bouncing ball tutorial. While I wrote this tutorial with Android 4.1 in mind, there is nothing that is 4.1 specific. Running it on an older device simply means you won't get to see the souped up Android animation engine in action. You can follow along with the step-by-step outline below, or download and import the entire project. 1. Create a new Android project in Eclipse. Target Android 1.6 or higher. Don't forget to rename the startup activity to Main.java, along with the associated layout resource. 2. Because we will be drawing the entire canvas ourselves, we will want to handle orientation ourselves as well. This is done by modifying the activity in the AndroidManifest.xml file.
