You hear your phone ringing and you look down to see who it is, when you notice that your own name shows up as the caller ID. Is it yourself calling from the future? Maybe just a glitch with your phone? The latter is far more possible, but there are also several other possibilities. RELATED: The "Tech Support" Scammers Called HTG (So We Had Fun with Them) It's Probably a Spam Caller Here's the most likely scenario: it's just a spammer or telemarketer spoofing the caller ID. Instead of showing their own phone number on your caller ID, it shows your own phone number as a way to hide theirs. It seems counter-intuitive because it might raise more eyebrows, but they're betting that you're more likely to pick up the phone if the caller ID says "unknown", "private caller", or even your own phone number than if it says "Telemarketing, Inc". In addition, while their phone number might be on a blacklist, your own phone number most definitely isn't, so it's a clever way to get around that roadblock. You might have even seen phone numbers calling you that are very similar to your own number, and it might be off by just one or two numbers. This is also another method of spoofing and it's likely a spammer or telemarketer on the other end. It Could Just Be a Bug. Though Of course, there could also be any number of ways that your phone could call itself by accident, and sometimes it could just be a bug in the software. One user says that someone called him while he was on the phone with someone else and instead of switching to the new call and putting the current caller on hold, he ended the call, which prompted his own phone to call itself. This can also happen with VoIP phones, where if you dial a number and then hang up, the call can go haywire and the phone will call itself instead, most likely because the phone knows that it needed to make a call, but didn't know who to call, so it just calls itself. If you have an iPhone, Siri has the ability to place a call to your own phone. You can do this on purpose by telling Siri to "call myself". So, it's always possible that Siri might mishear something you say and call your own phone, especially if you have Hey Siri enabled, where it's always listening for a command. In Any Case, Just Don't Answer It Whatever the cause may be, the best course of action to take is simply just not answering it. After all, it's probably not you from the future, so you won't be missing an important call by leaving it unanswered. Nothing good or worthwhile will come from answering your phone that shows your own number as the caller ID. There are a few exceptions, of course. You might need to purposely call your own number when you set up your voicemail or access certain carrier settings. You can also call yourself to get out of a meeting or gracefully bail on a bad date by using a service called IFITTT, but it uses its own phone number to call your phone whenever you need it to. Image Credit: Jon Phillips/Flickr We can't hide behind email. Why? Real business relationships are formed in two ways, says entrepreneur-turned-investor Mark Suster: in person and over the phone. The dude knows how to keep a phoner concise and effective-so let's heed his call to make better calls. 1) Get preparedYou don't have to be a politician to have talking points in your pocket-or, maybe more accessibly, written down before you make the call. From Suster's description, it's prep like how reporters do phone interviews: sketch out the points you'd like to cover, the "ask" that you're making, and how much time you have. This gives your call an anchor.The best interviews are conversations, but as Miles Davis might tell you, it takes a lot of preparation to properly improvise.Leaping into your hard "sales pitch" is awkward, Suster observes, so start soft: while you might consider yourself too cool to talk about the weather, asking what the other person is experiencing is an easy way to build empathy and co-investment. But if the rapport isn't rising, it's get to business time.3) Be explicitOnce the banter buffer has been built, transition to the matter at hand-and let the other person know what it is (they can't read your mind, especially over the phone). Suster says you should say something like "listen, the reason I'm calling is..."-which is as direct as it is useful and helps each of you align your interests.And if you don't have a specific ask, you can say something as simple as "I was just hoping to get 10 minutes of your time to tell you what we're up to so that the next chance we get to meet down the line you've got more of an understanding. "Yes, you're excited about your business, but a phone call is a dialogue, not a monologue. "This is bad enough in person but I promise you if you do it over the phone the recipient will start to tune out." Suster says. "If you listen closely you'll probably even hear the tapping of a keyboard."To prevent that, you can pause your pitch to ask if they're with you and maybe gather some feedback-which will make you smarter on your next call. "Don't ask for four things or you'll get none," Suster quips, and your one ask should be obvious, easily achievable.6) Know the relationshipDon't ask for a big favor lest you have a tight relationship. Suster says. Your network isn't just the number of nodes, we've learned; it's the quality of relationships.7) Know the timelineAssume this won't be the only time in your life that you'll talk to them. Suster says, so you don't need to fit everything into a single conversation. "If you cultivate a good long-term relationship through patience, persistence and reciprocity there will be many more occasions," Suster says, echoing the tenets of scam-free networking.8) Keep it shortYour reputation is the sum of the interactions people have with you. Phoners are a part of that process, Suster says: When you think of your relationship with the individual as a relationship you'll build over time and over many calls, discussions, chats at conferences or whatever you'll realize you need to be known for being respectful of others' time. If you're known as the person who's always long winded you're less likely to get the next few calls on the calendar. Less is better, I promise.
